About studying Sociology
At a time in which citizens, governments and corporations alike are calling for solutions to urgent social problems, training in Sociology equips graduates with the skills to pose the right problems and to address them effectively. Sociology is not content to treat the changing fortunes of individuals as merely personal or accidental, but provides tools to connect them to wider social forces, institutions, diverse forms of power and processes of social change.

Sociology focuses on the factors and issues that have a direct bearing on peoples’ quality of life and sense of identity. The research sociologists generate is critically informed and methodologically diverse. It helps citizens and policymakers challenge common-sense ideas about the causes of social problems, such as inequality, criminality, social malaise and conflict, illness, climate change and so on.

Sociologists study all aspects of social life. These include the effects of transformations in science and technology, work and leisure arrangements, family life, popular culture, medical services, consumption practices, global economies and migration, religiosity and spirituality, social movements and natural resource use.

Career opportunities
A sociology degree provides students with a cognitive and transferable skill set and empowers them to participate effectively in wider intellectual and policy debates about key social issues. It is therefore a recognised and valued qualification.

Sociology graduates develop career trajectories in many fields including policymaking, journalism and diplomacy, project management, migrant and ethnic affairs, market research, services for the aged, community development, welfare policy and administration, women’s issues, human resources, youth and family services, crime and justice services, workforce research and health services. Graduates may find employment in federal, state and local government departments and research agencies, in community service organisations and NGOs, and in the commercial sector.

Gabriela Falzon

Studying sociology has given me the means to analyse and interpret society through radical and revolutionary frameworks. I have especially enjoyed learning about how different thinkers have criticised the structures and hierarchies that underlie capitalist and patriarchal society.

By studying the social construction and perpetuation of ideas that we often see as ‘natural’ I have been able to develop a different lens through which I can understand the world. One of the crucial lessons that sociology and gender studies teaches us is that theory is not simply for interpreting phenomena on an abstract level; it can be used to practically change and transform our society in a radically political way.

This has been a helpful field to combine with my interest in progressive political action in the union movement and the continuing fight for a world that does not exclude or punish marginalised groups. By understanding how and why inequality exists we can also understand how to prevent its existence. I look forward to continuing my studies in sociology and gender theory and further learning about how we can create a better society.
